careers." Clicking over to the blog, I saw that the second career listed was "Actuary Consultant." I kid you not!

According to the blog, the two main characteristics of these minimalist careers are:

- Flexibility: You should be able to create your own schedule to a certain degree. Hours need to be pliable: a job demanding 50+ hours every week with no exceptions will not make the list.

- Lucrativeness: The point of work is to make money. The point of a minimalist career is to make money as efficiently as possible; that is, needing the least time and effort for the most gain.

As we prepare for the next generation of young actuaries to enter our ranks, let us consider some millennial preferences. They embrace:

[illegible]. Millennials are the first generation born after the technological revolution. For them, mobility is the new stability. It is difficult to live a mobile lifestyle with a house full of stuff.

[illegible]. Technology has provided a platform on which access can take precedence of ownership.

[illegible]. Millennials migrate toward smaller dwellings in walkable neighborhoods with access to shared amenities.

[illegible]. Millennials spend less on possessions but more on wellness, food, drink and experiences.
